It is known to provide a diesel particulate filter (DPF) on a diesel engine. The DPF is used to reduce the amount of particulate matter emitted from the engine. Specifically, the DPF filters particulate matter, such as soot, from the engine exhaust. A DPF should be regenerated when the amount of particulate matter stored therein reaches a certain threshold. The DPF may be regenerated by one of several methods. One known regenerating method includes injecting fuel into the filter or into the exhaust flow of the engine. Another known regenerating method includes increasing the temperature of the filter sufficiently to burn the particulate matter stored therein. While the above regenerating methods may be beneficial, the temperature of the exhaust flow of the engine may not reach a temperature sufficient to burn the particulate matter. Additionally, during cold start conditions, the exhaust temperature may not be high enough to regenerate the DPF. It is known to provide a diesel particulate filter and a cold start additive in an effort to regenerate the DPF during cold start conditions. However, the prior art methods may not be as effective as
