A 9-year-old boy was admitted with the complaint of recurrent cough. His chest radiograph and computed tomography revealed exudative lesions from the bronchi to the right upper lobe to the right parahilar region. The pathological examination of the transbronchial biopsy specimens was suggestive of lipomatosis. The diagnosis was confirmed by the histological examination of the lung specimen and the skin specimens obtained at the anterior mediastinal approach. From the investigations of lipomatosis of the respiratory tract, several factors appear to be involved. The best known of these are heavy smoking and traumatic injury. This patient had neither a history of smoking nor any sign of trauma, and he had a family history of multiple lipomatosis. The relationship between the case reported here and multiple lipomatosis of the respiratory tract is discussed.Chronic venous insufficiency is characterized by a reduction in blood returning from the extremities, which may include the lower body, pelvis and legs and is manifested by swelling, pain, skin changes, ulcers, and superficial varicose veins. The reduction in blood returning to the heart results in inadequate blood flow to the heart and reduced cardiac output, which in turn may lead to other adverse conditions. Treatment of chronic venous insufficiency typically involves compression therapy, drug therapy and/or surgery. Compression therapy includes the use of bandaging or compression hosiery, such as compression stockings. Compression stockings have long been used to help increase venous return and to reduce leg edema. It is believed that compression therapy is effective to improve venous circulation and remove obstructions or varicosities by restricting blood flow through the veins. It is generally recognized that
