Carbonic anhydrase-associated protein mediates long-range communication between vertebrate heart and brain. A novel plasma membrane protein, carbonic anhydrase-associated protein (CARP), is concentrated in the high-surface area ventricular cardiomyocyte and within type I myofibers of skeletal muscle. In cardiac fibroblasts, CARP is uniquely enriched in the transverse tubules at the triads of the sarcolemma. CARP abundance is co-regulated with cardiac, skeletal, and cardiac endothelial isoforms of carbonic anhydrase (CA), suggesting a role in cardiovascular regulation. To address the function of CARP in the heart, we generated a gene-targeted mutant mouse strain. The CARP-deficient strain demonstrated a high degree of growth and reproductive compensation. However, CARP-deficient cardiomyocytes displayed diminished basal cytosolic Ca(2+) levels, and impaired beat-to-beat alternans. Under isoproterenol stimulation, CARP-deficient cardiomyocytes exhibited a significant reduction of transient outward K(+) current (Ito), and prolonged end systolic Ca(2+) transients, accompanied by a 50% reduction of beating frequency. These cellular alterations were rescued by adenoviral re-expression of CARP. Hence, CARP has emerged as a cardiomyocyte surface-located Ca(2+) buffer and may provide a means by which cardiomyocytes communicate with each other to regulate their contractility.
