To analyze the relationship between the characteristics of the social participation of the disabled and their potential predictors. A cross-sectional study was conducted in a sample of people with disability in a health district in the province of Valencia (Spain) using a structured questionnaire. Sociodemographic, cultural and health factors in each of the three dimensions were analyzed. The concept of social participation was constructed from the WHO's International Classification of Functioning, Disability and Health. The new structural equation model showed good fitness indices and explained 43.9% of the variance in social participation. Income level was a significant factor related to the three dimensions of the social participation of the disabled, whereas the remaining variables were not statistically significant. The model shows that income level is a predictor in both dimensions of social participation, that helps to explain 39.3% of the variance. Health, culture, and social support also contributed to explaining 27.0% of the variance in the first dimension of social participation. The findings of this study provide a profile of those who tend to have a lower participation in the dimensions of social life of the disabled and allow us to propose an action plan to improve social participation of the disabled.

Left Ventricular Relaxation Phase is Most Affected in Chronic Heart Failure with Preserved Ejection Fraction. In the last few years, the prevalence of chronic heart failure (CHF) with preserved ejection fraction (HFpEF) has increased. We hypothesized that abnormalities of myocardial relaxation are responsible for the reduced ventricular-arterial coupling in HFpEF. We studied 42 patients with CHF (44 ± 13 years old, 65% women) and 27 healthy subjects (55 ± 14 years old, 84% women) matched for gender and age. Using a two-dimensional speckle-tracking imaging approach, we analyzed right ventricular (RV) and left ventricular (LV) longitudinal, circumferential, and radial deformation (LVM and LVEDV). Systolic and diastolic abnormalities were defined by a reduction in the maximal
