this is the lowest serial number to be stamped on a fender in a set of guitars. we are extremely lucky that the original was sold to a collector who kept this special fender. i will do my best to keep this information up to date as i find more of these. hopefully, if and when this original instrument ever hits the market, it will be sold at a reputable guitar center that will keep and preserve the original. the history of the fender precision bass begins with a small number of instruments that leo fender designed and assembled in his home workshop in fullerton, california, in the late 1940s. these basses were intended as a lower-cost alternative to fenders other popular guitars. however, the most important thing to know is that while this chart may be helpful, there are no guarantees that any serial number will correlate to a certain year in the production. there are numerous factors that can contribute to this problem, including: the history of the instrument. was it originally purchased new, or was it a used instrument? fenders do not always retain their original serial numbers. if you have a question about a particular serial number, you should call fender at 1-800-4-fender. the serial number on the neck. some necks have the serial number changed to a combination of numbers and letters. this does not affect the instrument itself. fender knows about this and tries to make the process as accurate as possible. if you have a question about a neck serial number, you should call fender at 1-800-4-fender. the serial number on the body. if you notice that a serial number on the body is different from the neck, you should call fender at 1-800-4-fender.

Fender Precision Bass Serial Number Guide

note that it was always possible for a guitar to be put into production without a serial number. so while the serial number isn't a certain way to figure out when a guitar was built, it is at least a good general guide to show when a model was mass-produced. the first serial number system for fender was used from 1948 to early 1950. this system is a numerical system that started from the bottom and worked its way to the top. each serial number was a different color, depending on the year they were produced. there were no letters or numbers, just an ascending numeric sequence. the first three serial numbers in this system were: 5, 6, and 7. serial number color changed in early 1950. this system is a numerical system that started from the bottom and worked its way to the top. each serial number was a different color, depending on the year they were produced. there were no letters or numbers, just an ascending numeric sequence. the first three serial numbers in this system were: 38, 39, and 40. this is a pretty simple system as it doesn't have any letters or any special cases. it is a numerical system that starts from the bottom and works its way up. there are four serial numbers in this system: 04, 05, 06, and 07. the serial numbers in this system were always written in the same order (no matter which end of the guitar they were on) with a string of zeros between the two numbers. the first three numbers in this system were: 50, 51, and 52. a serial number, which you can't tell from the picture, is stamped on the body just above the bridge. they are always in the same place and are the only markings on the body. we have acquired and documented a large collection of serial numbers from other sources, mostly from guitars and basses that are in the public domain. we are collecting them here in this serial number guide to make it easier for you to distinguish between the various model years. 5ec8ef588b
