Salinity induced changes in the DNA pattern of an intertidal benthic assemblage. To investigate the intertidal dynamics of trophic interactions in the Baltic Sea, the studied organisms were sampled at regular intervals from low to high water level. The fauna was analysed on the basis of the relative DNA content of the different taxonomic groups. The concentration of Na^+ and K^+ in the water along the salinity gradient were measured to detect the influences of salinity. Furthermore, the concentration of fluoride ions was determined to identify an additional mechanism for trophic control. The results show that the highest food concentration is reached in the middle and lowest in the intertidal zone. The value of the critical grazing rate (CGR) was calculated for all groups showing a mean value of about 40 kg dry weight $\text{m}^{-2} \text{d}^{-1}$. Above a critical salinity of 35 ppt the CGR becomes zero. Here the trophic interactions are based solely on physico-chemical factors. The relative DNA content suggests that the number of grazers is reduced already at an increase in salinity of 25 ppt. No further reduction of the species numbers in high water level can be detected. The numerical dominance of the dominant species (Asellus aquaticus L.) can be determined in this study. Chemoresistive C_4F_6 -polystyrene-nanocomposite (PNC) membrane for gas separation. A new gas-permeable composite membrane, polyvinylidene fluoride (PVDF)/C(4)F(6)-polystyrene (PS), has been prepared via the in situ polymerization of C(4)F(6) monomer in PVDF matrix, and its gas permeation properties were investigated. In the PNC membrane, PVDF was uniformly dispersed in the C(4)F(6) matrix, and the distance between the interphase of the two phases can be adjusted by changing the amount of C(4)F(6) monomer added, which is demonstrated by scanning electron microscopy analysis. Compared with the pure PVDF film, the PNC membrane showed a reasonable gas permeability with a high selectivity for C(4)F(6)/H(2) and C(4)F(6)/CH(4) gas pairs. The water vapor permeability (WVP) of the PNC membrane is in the range of 10^{-4} - 10^{-3} g m⁻² day⁻¹ Pa⁻¹, and it is much lower than that of the pure PVDF membrane, which demonstrates that the PVDF/C(4)F(6)-PS composite membrane can be a potential candidate for membrane gas separation.

Q: Exceptions not working as expected I'm using Microsoft.Owin.Cors to set the Access-Control-Allow-Headers in my API app, and I keep getting a 400 with the following message: "message":

"The request entity's media type 'application/json; charset=utf-8' is not supported for this resource.
